

The Brief

Bakermill Bakeries wanted to launch a new bread. It tasted better than existing loaves, and was healthier because the new process didn't destroy the goodness of the wheat, as the normal Chorleywood process does. The bread contained less water and air than normal, so the texture was also more granular. In short, it was a better bread. The bread was wholemeal and sliced, and came in a standard 800g pack.

The media schedule had not yet been decided, by my task was to:

1. Devise a set of possible brand names for the product.
2. Produce a set of 5-10 concepts for the product.

Process

1. I whittled an initial list of 96 brand names down to short-list of 17. Those listed in green and bold appear in my final recommendations.
2. Each concept is on a separate page and explores different styles and themes, with a headline and description of what the visual would be.
